THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 24.

INSTINCT OF THE ORIOLE.—A remarkable case of bird instinct was related at Harrisburg, Pa., a few days ago by Miss Laura Glides, of Gaysport, Pa. She visited the home of George M. Seibert near Duncausville, Blair county, last October, and one day while walking through the woods she spied an oriole's nest with four fledglings in it. The parent birds were apparently not in the vicinity, and she took the nest with the little creatures in it to her room in Mr. Seibert's house. When the mother bird returned to the place where the nest had been and found that her little ones were not there she flew around in great distress, and in her wildness she darted into the open window of Miss Glides's room, and there she discovered her stolen treasures. During the remainder of Miss Glides's visit the window in her room was left open, and each day mother oriole flew away to the woods and returned with food, and finally she became so gentle that she heeded not the presence of persons in the room, and they frequently gathered there to watch the freaks of the feathered tribe. When Miss Glides returned to her home at Gaysport she took mother oriole and the birdlets with her, and shortly after her arrival there she released the old bird and kept the little ones in a cage in her house. The mother bird tarried around the house for three or four weeks, each day flying into the kitchen where the little ones were caged to feed them, and then she disappeared and it was believed would not return again. This proved otherwise, however. One day last week Miss Glides was walking in the garden, and in her favorite place on an apple tree just outside the kitchen window sat the same old mother oriole who left so suddenly last November. A fine male bird of the same species, and probably a triage lord, kept her company. The old birds and their young ones were put together in one large cage, and are now entirely domesticated.
